Guest Speaker

Guest speaker Luke Malpas is Stuff's political editor leading a team of 5 based at Parliament. He previously worked for 12 years at the Australian Financial Review as an editorial writer and was therefore willing to take questions on politics in both NZ and Australia. He explained that the internet has dramatically changed the way news is delivered and consequently news stories quickly have little monetary value. Therefore, Stuff concentrate on giving more detailed analysis of the stories of the day.

Luke gave his analysis of politics during the 2 years of Covid and the changes that have taken place since with inflation and the economy becoming the main concern. He believes that we are moving into a period of uncertainty with World events a major contributor. He also briefly gave his opinion on the Australian election, British politics and his belief that despite the rise of 'dictators' around the World democracy will still prevail.
